Notes, especially when reading, is a strategic intellectual ability and discipline (and not a mechanical process of drawing up the summaries). Why? When taking notes you pay attention (after relevant decision) to those aspects which are key (both theoretical or General argument, and empirical argument or case study specific question).

Outlining, you select appropriate material and develop your understanding of the theoretical principles and/or empirical arguments (i.e. what kind of facts or confirm a particular position, or refute it).

It should be noted that when reading some texts you make more notes than other due to the fact that they will be useful to you in future work or have more to do with you are interested in the problem and/or are more interesting and/or more substantial in theoretical or empirical points of view. Then read the material divided by you to one that is more for you and less interest in the foregoing reasons. We offer to your attention the following method of note-taking: divide your notebook into two columns. In the left you make notes of the material that I read, and in right (at the same time or later) you perform a comparative analysis of the contents of this syllabus with other facts about which you have previously read, heard (lectures), discussed (in the classroom — tutorials or informally), as well as with your own comments and critical remarks on the text you are reading. In other words, you are using your notes to construct cross-szybki, on their own accord, formulations, data, and including their own comments on the statements of others.
